Most taxpayers think the tax year field is a formality, but the IRS uses it to locate the correct ledger. An incorrect year sends the claim to the wrong account, generating a “no record found” response that stalls the case. Double-check the year on the notice you received or on the original return before entering it on Form 843. The IRS expects concrete proof: bank statements, cancelled checks, or a copy of the original notice. Filing a blank “explanation” box or attaching a vague letter from a CPA often results in a “request for additional information” notice. To avoid this, attach a concise cover page that lists each document and the specific line items it supports. Many online guides copy a one-size-fits-all paragraph that reads, “I respectfully request abatement of penalties.” While polite, the wording lacks the required reference to the exact penalty code (e.g., 6654 for failure to file). Tailor each claim to the penalty cited on the IRS notice; a precise reference can shave days off the processing timeline. that delay refunds and invite additional fees. Recent guidance highlights three recurring errors—misstating the tax year, omitting required documentation, and using a one-size-fits-all template—that most busy filers can sidestep with a few targeted checks. By addressing these issues before submission, taxpayers can accelerate approval and keep the IRS from sending another notice. Form 843, “Claim for Refund and Request for Abatement,” is the IRS’s shortcut for taxpayers who believe a penalty, interest charge, or a specific tax assessment was applied in error. Common scenarios include an overpaid estimated tax, an incorrectly calculated late payment penalty, or a misapplied surcharge on a business expense. The form is not a blanket forgiveness request; it must be anchored to a precise tax code provision and supported by clear evidence. Imagine a small business owner who missed a quarterly estimated tax deadline because a bank transfer was delayed. The IRS automatically assessed a $200 late payment penalty. By filing Form 843 within 30 days and attaching the bank’s transaction record, the owner secured a full abatement. The catch? The owner originally cited “2023” instead of “2024” as the tax year, prompting the IRS to flag the claim for review and extend processing time by several weeks.
