While the rules differ by state, most require a clear benchmark—an exact number of correct answers or a percentage—to ensure you're ready for the road. Knowing that benchmark, and how it's calculated, can save you a costly retake and boost your confidence heading into the test. Unlike a test that simply says "70% is enough," the written driving test usually sets a fixed number of correct responses. In many U.S. states, the exam contains 50 multiple-choice questions, and the minimum threshold is 35 correct answers, equaling a 70% passing rate. However, some states adjust the total number of questions or the cutoff percentage. For example, Texas uses a 36-question test with a 78% threshold, while New York's test is 66 questions with a 66% requirement. These numbers aren't arbitrary. They reflect the state's assessment of what knowledge level is sufficient for safe driving—covering traffic laws, right-of-way rules, and hazard recognition. Question Pool: Each state designs a question bank reflecting its road codes. Questions can vary in difficulty, but the test is weighted equally. Answer Choices: Typically, each question offers four options, with only one correct. Wrong answers do not penalize you, so the goal is simply to hit the threshold. Score Calculation: Your raw score is the number of correct answers. That raw score is then converted into a percentage. If your percentage meets or exceeds the state-specific threshold, you pass.
