manual data collection, typically through spreadsheets or group chats. This approach creates three recurring problems: Data fragmentation: Names, budgets, and wish lists become scattered across multiple threads, increasing the risk of errors. Privacy breaches: Sharing personal wish lists in open forums can expose sensitive information. Time drain: Organizers spend hours verifying entries, randomizing draws, and notifying participants. Researchers studying informal gifting practices note that these inefficiencies often lead to reduced participation rates, especially in larger groups where coordination complexity scales exponentially.
