documents required by your state of incorporation. The primary document is the Articles of Incorporation (sometimes called a Corporate Charter). The state's official website is your authoritative source for locating the correct form, fee schedule, and detailed instructions. This search involves identifying: the required statutory agent (a person or service authorized to receive legal documents on the corporation's behalf), the number and type of shares. Filing the Articles of Incorporation is just the beginning. A comprehensive search for secondary, but essential, documents is next. Chief among these are the corporate bylaws—a set of internal rules governing how the corporation will be managed, from officer roles to meeting protocols. While not filed with the state, they are a critical internal record. You should also search for templates for organizational resolutions, which formally document the first official actions of the board, such as appointing officers. A complete registration process includes a multi-level search for necessary identifications and licenses. After state formation, you must apply for an Employer Identification Number (EIN) from the IRS—a straightforward online search on the IRS website yields the free application form. This number is your corporation's federal tax ID, essential for hiring employees and opening a bank account. Additionally, you must research and secure any required local or county business licenses and permits based on your industry. Buy my book, The Art Of Legal Tax Avoidance ...
